2. Introduction to the Committee:FCC

A Fictional Crisis Committee (FCC) in Model United Nations (MUN) is a specialized committee that simulates a crisis situation or scenario that is not necessarily based on real-world events. Unlike traditional MUN committees, which often discuss real issues and historical events, a Fictional Crisis Committee operates in a fictional universe or a hypothetical scenario.

In an FCC, delegates represent different characters or entities within the fictional scenario and work to respond to the crisis at hand. The crisis could be anything from a global pandemic to a geopolitical conflict to a natural disaster, depending on the theme chosen by the organizers of the MUN conference.

Delegates in an FCC are tasked with crafting responses, making decisions, and managing the crisis within the context of the fictional scenario. They must use their diplomatic skills, negotiation abilities, and strategic thinking to address the crisis and achieve their objectives while representing the interests of the characters or entities they represent.

Fictional Crisis Committees add an element of creativity, imagination, and unpredictability to Model United Nations conferences, allowing delegates to engage in dynamic and challenging simulations that test their leadership, problem-solving, and crisis management skills.
